A Special Tribute to Mark Rogovin

His tireless effort to preserve the Haymarket Martyrs' Monument and tell the story of the working class fighters buried alongside it is a unique contribution to keeping labor history alive. For Mark, we are certain, it is also a labor of love.

Understanding its international significance as labor's most sacred monument, Mark Rogovin continues to watch over the structural well-being of the Martyrs' Monument, just as he did during the major restoration completed by the ILHS in 2011. His booklet, The Day Will Come, is a rich and detailed visitors' guide to the heroes buried in Forest Home Cemetery. His work ensures that the impact on present day society of their drive for peace and justice, strong and democratic unions will forever be remembered.

Labor in Transformation: Fighting for the Rights of Today's Low-Wage and Immigrant Workers

Is labor at one of those key moments that can transform the movement? Fast food, big box and warehouse workers stage protest strikes, coalitions form to fight for immigrant rights and new forms of organizing emerge at the workplace and in communities.

The Illinois Labor History Society always seeks to look back at our past to understand our current times. Workers organizing, particularly in emerging industries, is always a challenge. Walmart has replaced U.S. Steel and GM as the nation's largest employer. How do workers organize in a contingent, minimum wage workplace?

To help us probe these issues, please join us at the annual ILHS Union Hall of Honor on Sunday, December 8, beginning at 4:30 PM at the National Association of Letter Carriers Branch 11 Hall, 3850 S. Wabash.

Former Illinois Department of Labor director Esther Lopez will reflect on current workplace conditions and organizing campaigns to win dignity and respect. We will induct into our Hall of Honor an immigrant worker who fought the good fight organizing in the 1940s and 1950s, Refugio Martinez of the Packinghouse Workers, deported for his union activities. And we will induct and give special thanks to Mark Rogovin for his great work in researching the grave sites and story around the 1893 Haymarket Memorial in Forest Home Cemetery, chronicled in his ILHS publication, The Day Will Come.
